Aristotle and positive organisational scholarship on ethical leadership

Director: Alejo Sison

This PhD project aims to give a profound understanding of what ethical leadership is. In detail, it centers around Aristotelian thoughts on governance and Positive Organizational Scholarship (Positive Leadership). Its core objective is to cross-fertilize these two leadership approaches and therefore stimulate the general development of ethical leadership theories. To do this so, the PhD project intends to identify similarities and differences between the Aristotelian school of thought and Positive Organizational Scholarship in terms of virtue ethics and leadership approaches. In other words, it aims to identify common or shared conclusions among the two schools that could help to form the doctrinal pillars of the virtues ethics position in business and management.
